It contains a collection of books, not large, but choice. THE DINING ROOM. This is spacious and handsome--not wholly unfitted even for the hospitality, which marked and dignified the days of our old English Barons. THE PAVILION. The Stranger--gaining admittance into the House by its north-entrance--after having sufficiently gazed on the various objects, that may excite and gratify his curiosity, in passing through its numerous apartments--usually takes his departure, by the opposite entrance; which leads through the magnificent Portico, so grandly adorning its southern and principal front. And, here, he will pause with delight, especially, if a lover of picturesque beauty; ranging from one attractive point to another of the charming prospect--which opens in commanding view, over the deer-park, embracing nearly its whole extent. Expanding before the eye, is seen--a vast plain of delicious verdure, gently varied in its surface, watered by the windings of its own river; animated by numerous herds of deer j embellished by a profusion of trees j sometimes dispersed singly about, sometimes collected into little irregular groups; and, at length, united in mass, forming those immense plantations, stretch round, in a wide compass, like an almost interminable forest, flourishing with much of the unconstrained freedom and wild luxuriance of nature. The long waving line of wood is finely broken, in one part, by an opening which admits the view of artificial ruins, well designed, called JDunstall Castle. Such--in scanty outline--is the enchanting scenery, combining to a high degree, the grand and the...
