CHAPTER XXII THE FAKE INVESTMENT THERE are several reasons why I do not claim statistical accuracy for the statements I am about to make. The first reason is based upon the impossibility of finding authoritative data. There are facts and tendencies which we see, and which impress us with their prevalence, and yet they cannot be measured by rule or collated by numbers. I do not think that I will be accused of exaggeration, or of an attempt to appeal sensationally to the reader, if I advance the opinion that more money is lost, and more families are ruined, by the purchase of questionable and fraudulent mining and other stocks than result from any other cause, in business and out of business, except, perhaps, intemperance. There are now before the public, and there may be for many years, thousands of alleged investment propositions,...
